This settlement is bad.

Force them to open office api's and windows api's to give people a choice.

This is asking very little, they open the api's, we will do the hard part of coding replacements.

Also no major distributor (Dell or Gateway), can sell computers that boot into Windows and another os because of their oem agreements.

Microsoft's only punishment should be that they must compete--make them open the office and windows api's, and let major distributors sell linux and windows--and let consumers decide if they want to (they don't have a choice now) spend $400 dollars a year to type a letter.
